U.S. Senate Vacancies: How Are They Filled?

Senate Vacancies in the Constitution and State Law

Vacancies in the membership of the U.S. Senate can occur as the result of the resignation, death, or expulsion of a Member, or the refusal of the Senate to seat a Senator-elect. Article I, Section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution originally vested the power of appointment to fill Senate vacancies exclusively with the state governors when the legislatures were in recess, with the state legislatures authorized to elect replacements to serve the balance of the term at their next session. The Seventeenth Amendment, ratified in 1913, provided for direct election of Senators and directed governors to issue writs of election to fill vacancies. It also authorized state legislatures to empower governors to make temporary appointments until successors can be elected. At present, 45 states authorize their governors to appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy until a replacement is elected. Five states, however, provide that Senate vacancies may be filled only by election.

Filling Vacancies by Special Election Only: Five States

Five states currently require Senate vacancies be to filled only by special elections; their governors are not empowered to fill a vacancy by appointment. They are as follows:

- North Dakota
- Oregon
- Rhode Island
- Wisconsin
- Oklahoma

Typically, these states provide for an expedited election process in order to reduce the period during which the seat is vacant. If the vacancy falls late in the term, the seat is filled at the regularly scheduled general election.

Filling Vacancies by Gubernatorial Appointment

Forty-five states authorize their governors to fill Senate vacancies by appointment.

Filling Vacancies by Gubernatorial Appointment Through the Next Statewide General Election: 36 States

Thirty-six of the 45 states that provide for gubernatorial appointment authorize their governors to select a Senator who holds the seat until the next regularly scheduled statewide general election, when a special election is held to fill the seat for the balance of the term. They are as follows:

- Arizona
- Arkansas
- California
- Colorado
- Delaware
- Florida
- Georgia
- Hawaii
- Idaho
- Illinois
- Indiana
- Iowa
- Kansas
- Kentucky
- Louisiana
- Maine
- Maryland
- Michigan
- Minnesota
- Mississippi
- Missouri
- Montana
- Nebraska
- Nevada
- New Hampshire
- New Jersey
- New Mexico
- New York
- North Carolina
- North Dakota
- Ohio
- Oklahoma
- Oregon
- Pennsylvania
- South Carolina
- South Dakota
- Tennessee
- Texas
- Utah
- Virginia
- Washington
- West Virginia
- Wisconsin
- Wyoming

In several of these states (Hawaii, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, and Virginia), if a Senate vacancy occurs close to a regularly scheduled statewide primary or general election, the appointed Senator serves until the next following statewide election.

Filling Vacancies by Gubernatorial Appointment Followed by an Expedited Special Election: Nine States

The remaining nine states that provide for gubernatorial appointment also generally require a stand-alone special election to fill the seat on an accelerated schedule, rather than waiting for the next regular statewide election. If the vacancy does occur close to a regularly scheduled general election, the special election may be held concurrently, but if not, the special election may be scheduled within a few months of the vacancy. This provision is intended to reduce the length of time an appointed Senator holds office before being replaced by an elected successor. In these states, the appointed Senator generally serves only until the election results for a successor are certified. They are as follows:

Alabama
The governor appoints a replacement, and is required to order a special election “forthwith” if the vacancy occurs more than four months before a general election. “If the vacancy occurs within 60 days before a general election, the Governor shall order a special election to be held on the first Tuesday after the lapse of 60 days from and after the day on which the vacancy is known to the Governor.”

Alaska
The governor appoints a replacement, and a special election is held, generally beginning with a primary election to be held 60-90 days after the vacancy occurs and then followed by a special general election about 60 days later. The schedule is somewhat modified in certain election years.

Connecticut
The governor appoints a replacement to fill the vacancy if the term expires within 14 months of the vacancy, with the governor’s appointment subject to approval by two-thirds vote of both houses of the legislature. If time until expiration is greater, the governor orders a special election to be held 150 days later, unless regular statewide elections are scheduled sooner. The special election is then held concurrently with the regular election. If the vacancy occurs shortly before the term expires, the vacancy is not filled.

Louisiana
The governor appoints a replacement to fill the vacancy for the rest of the term if the term expires within one year. If more than a year remains in the term, a successor is elected for the balance of the term at a special election held in conformity with dates set by state law.

Massachusetts
The governor appoints a replacement to serve until a special election. The special election is held 145-160 days after the vacancy occurs, unless it occurs after April 10 of an even-numbered year; if so, the special election is held concurrently with the regularly scheduled statewide election.

Mississippi
The governor appoints a replacement until a special election is held. If less than one year remains on the incumbent’s term, the appointee serves the balance of the term. If more than one year remains, the special election is held within 90 days of the governor’s order for a special election, unless the vacancy occurs during a year when a statewide election is held, in which case the vacancy is filled at the regular election.

Texas
The governor appoints a replacement if a vacancy exists or will exist when the U.S. Senate is in session. If the vacancy occurs in an even-numbered year and 62 or more days before the primary, the vacancy is filled at that year’s general election. If the vacancy occurs in an odd-numbered year, or fewer than 62 days before the primary, the governor calls a special election, which is scheduled for the first uniform election date falling 36 or more days after it has been ordered.

Vermont
The governor appoints a replacement and orders a special election, which is held within six months of the vacancy, unless it occurs within six months of a general election, in which case the special election is held concurrently with the regular general election.

Washington
The governor appoints a replacement. Not more than 10 days after the vacancy, the governor orders a special election to be held not more than 140 days later. If the vacancy occurs less than eight months before a general election, a special election is held at the same time. If the vacancy occurs after the close of the filing period for the vacant Senate seat, a special election is held not more than 90 days after the regular general election.

Congressional and State Proposals for Change
Following controversies that arose in connection with appointments to fill Senate vacancies in 2008 and 2009, proposals to eliminate or curtail gubernatorial power to fill vacancies by appointment were introduced in the 111th Congress. H.R. 899, the Ethical and Legal Elections for Congressional Transitions Act, proposed expedited special elections to fill Senate vacancies, and assistance to states in meeting the cost of special elections. Proposed constitutional amendments S.J.Res. 7 and H.J.Res. 21 would have removed the option for gubernatorial appointment, requiring that all Senate vacancies be filled by special election. None of these measures progressed beyond committee hearings, and no similar proposal has been introduced since then.

In March 2021, the Kentucky Legislature enacted SB 228, which requires the governor to choose replacements for senatorial vacancies from among a list of three qualified candidates provided by the state executive committee of the previous incumbent’s political party. In September 2021, the California legislature enacted Assembly Bill AB 1495, legislation requiring Senators appointed by the governor to contest an election for the balance of the term held at the next general election.

Thomas H. Neale, Specialist in American National Government

https://crsreports.congress.gov