

Updated September 28, 2022

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA): An Overview

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA; P.L. 107-252; 52 U.S.C. §§20901-21145) is perhaps the closest thing in federal law to a general election administration statute. It is more wide-ranging in the topics it aims to address than other elections measures Congress has approved in the recent past, with a greater emphasis on federal assistance for states and localities.

Partly as a result of those features, HAVA and the election administration-dedicated agency it created, the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), have played a role in much of the recent congressional activity on election administration. Congress responded to foreign interference in the 2016 elections and the emergence of the Coronavirus Disease 2019 (COVID-19) pandemic in the 2020 election cycle, for example, by providing new funding for one of HAVA's EAC-administered grant programs. Bills have also been introduced in recent Congresses to revisit HAVA or the EAC or to extend them to new aspects of elections.

This In Focus provides a brief overview of HAVA, introducing the major provisions of the act. For more on HAVA and the role it has played in federal elections policymaking since its enactment in 2002, see CRS Report R46949, The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA): Overview and Ongoing Role in Election Administration Policy, by Karen L. Shanton.

Background

HAVA was enacted in response to issues with the administration of the 2000 elections. The highest-profile problems in 2000 were in Florida—where disputes about the vote count delayed the resolution of the presidential race for weeks—but post-election hearings and reports identified issues with various aspects of election administration across multiple states.

Congress's response to those findings, in HAVA, spanned a correspondingly wide range of elections topics, from voting systems to voter identification to the accessibility of the electoral process to individuals with disabilities. HAVA took three main approaches to the issues: (1) setting requirements for the administration of federal elections, (2) authorizing the first major federal grant programs for elections, and (3) providing for creation of the EAC.

Requirements

HAVA was designed, in part, to standardize certain aspects of the administration of federal elections. Some states and localities had adopted policies or technologies before the 2000 elections—such as provisional voting, statewide voter registration databases, and voting systems that notify voters of overvoting (making more selections for a given contest than permitted)—that may have helped them avoid some of the issues faced by other jurisdictions in 2000. Other policy proposals, such as changes to military and overseas voting processes, were offered in post-2000 hearings and reports.

HAVA required adoption of some of those state and local policies and technologies and post-2000 proposals. Title VII of the act amended existing law to include some of the proposed changes to military and overseas voting processes, and Title III set requirements for federal elections for

- voting systems, including requirements to offer voters the opportunity to check and correct their ballots, notify voters about overvoting, produce a manually auditable permanent paper record, provide for accessibility for individuals with disabilities and members of language minority groups, and meet specified error rate standards;
- provisional voting, including requirements to permit certain voters to cast provisional ballots and count provisional ballots cast by voters who are found to be eligible under state law to vote;
- voting information, including a requirement to post certain information at the polls, such as a sample ballot, voting instructions, and polling place hours;
- statewide voter registration databases, including requirements to implement centralized, computerized statewide voter registration lists and follow specified procedures for maintaining them;
- voter identification, including a requirement that certain first-time voters who register by mail provide identification in order to cast a regular ballot; and
- the federal mail voter registration form, including requirements to add age and citizenship questions to the federal mail voter registration form established by the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 (NVRA; P.L. 103-31; 52 U.S.C. §§20501-20511) and offer voters who fail to answer the citizenship question an opportunity to complete the form.

For details of those requirements and the changes HAVA made to military and overseas voting, see CRS Report R46949, The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA): Overview and Ongoing Role in Election Administration Policy, by Karen L. Shanton. For more on military and overseas voting in general, see CRS In Focus IF11642, Absentee Voting for Uniformed Services and Overseas Citizens: Roles and Process, In Brief, by R. Sam Garrett.

HAVA left decisions about how to implement—and, to a certain extent, enforce—its Title III requirements to the states. The act directed the EAC to issue voluntary guidance for implementing the Title III requirements but left states discretion over exactly how to meet them. It assigned federal enforcement of the requirements to the U.S. Department of Justice but routed action by individual voters on violations through state-based administrative complaint procedures rather than an explicit private right of action.

Grant Programs

Complying with HAVA's Title III requirements involved significant financial investments for many states and localities. There were also other post-2000 changes to election processes—not addressed by the HAVA requirements—that states and localities wanted or needed to make. Congress accounted for both of those circumstances, in HAVA, with a pair of general grant programs that were designed to help states meet HAVA's Title III requirements and make certain general improvements to election administration: (1) a requirements payments program, and (2) a general improvements grant program.

HAVA also authorized grant programs to facilitate or incentivize action on specific issues or policy proposals, including grant programs related to

- voting technology, including for replacing lever and punch card voting systems used in the November 2000 election, for researching improvements to election systems, and for conducting pilot programs to test new voting technologies and implement them on a trial basis;
- disability access, including for improving the accessibility of polling places and for supporting work by protection and advocacy systems (state-level systems charged with empowering and advocating for individuals with disabilities) to help ensure electoral access for individuals with disabilities; and
- youth voter participation and poll worker recruitment, including for conducting voter education activities for students and their parents and for encouraging students to serve as poll workers and election officials to use their services.

To help ensure that grant funds are used as intended, HAVA provides for funding audits and repayments. It includes provisions for audits by the agencies that administer its grant programs, as well as regular audits of requirements payments and special audits of any HAVA funding on a vote of the Commissioners of the EAC.

For more information about HAVA's grant programs, including the funding Congress has authorized and appropriated for them to date, see CRS Report R46646, Election Administration: Federal Grant Funding for States and Localities, by Karen L. Shanton.

Election Assistance Commission (EAC)

Federal agency support for the general administration of elections was provided in 2000 by a small office at the Federal Election Commission (FEC) known as the Office of Election Administration (OEA). The scope of the issues with the conduct of the 2000 elections prompted calls for an expanded federal agency role in election administration.

Some proposed assigning any new responsibilities to the existing OEA, while others wanted to create a new agency that would be fully dedicated to election administration. There was also debate among Members about whether a new elections agency should have regulatory authority.

Congress struck a balance in HAVA by providing for a new agency, the EAC, but positioning it as a support agency. The EAC's rulemaking authority is explicitly limited by the act to regulations about two responsibilities it inherited from the FEC: (1) maintaining the federal mail voter registration form established by the NVRA, and (2) reporting to Congress about the impact of the NVRA on the administration of federal elections. The agency's other duties are assistance-oriented activities, such as administering grant programs; issuing voluntary guidance for implementing HAVA's Title III requirements; conducting elections research and sharing election administration best practices; developing federal Voluntary Voting System Guidelines (VVSG); and overseeing testing and certification of voting systems to the VVSG.

The structure of the EAC also reflects its positioning as a support agency. The EAC's four-member Commission, Office of Inspector General, and professional staff were paired by HAVA with three advisory bodies that are designed to play a central role in the direction and functioning of the agency and are composed of state and local officials and other elections stakeholders:

- Board of Advisors. Composed of representatives of state and local officials, federal agencies, science and technology experts, and voters. Responsible for reviewing voluntary guidance and draft VVSG and consulting on certain agency activities and planning.
- Standards Board. Composed of state and local officials. Responsible for reviewing voluntary guidance and draft VVSG and consulting on certain agency activities and planning.
- Technical Guidelines Development Committee. Composed of the Director of the National Institute of Standards and Technology and representatives of the Board of Advisors and Standards Board, state election officials, science and technology experts, and individuals with disabilities. Responsible for helping develop draft VVSG.

In 2021, the EAC used its authority to establish a fourth advisory body, the Local Leadership Council, consisting of local election officials and charged with advising the agency and helping it carry out its responsibilities.

For more on the VVSG and the duties and structure of the EAC, respectively, see CRS Insight IN11592, Voluntary Voting System Guidelines (VVSG): An Overview, by Karen L. Shanton; and CRS Report R45770, The U.S. Election Assistance Commission: Overview and Selected Issues for Congress, by Karen L. Shanton.

---

Karen L. Shanton, Analyst in American National Government

Disclaimer

This document was prepared by the Congressional Research Service (CRS). CRS serves as nonpartisan shared staff to congressional committees and Members of Congress. It operates solely at the behest of and under the direction of Congress. Information in a CRS Report should not be relied upon for purposes other than public understanding of information that has been provided by CRS to Members of Congress in connection with CRS's institutional role. CRS Reports, as a work of the United States Government, are not subject to copyright protection in the United States. Any CRS Report may be reproduced and distributed in its entirety without permission from CRS. However, as a CRS Report may include copyrighted images or material from a third party, you may need to obtain the permission of the copyright holder if you wish to copy or otherwise use copyrighted material.